STUDENTS CAN NOW TAKE A WHOLE CLASS ABOUT DOCTOR WHO

Very, very few things could make me long to still be in college, or school of any kind, but this is one of those things. Next semester, a professor at the Newhouse School of Public Communication at Syracuse University will be teaching a course on the history and lasting cultural impact of Doctor Who.

Now, what will a Doctor Who class entail exactly, you might be asking yourself; Rotolo told the Daily Orange, a Syracuse publication, that the course will focus on the show in terms of the digital age, since many of the historical context and references of the series' 50+ year history might not be well known to today's viewers of college age.

On top of watching and reading about the show, there will also be a large portion devoted to Twitter participation and quizzes, bringing what will probably be about 200 students worldwide into a community. The course is currently not offered as an official Syracuse University class, but students can petition that the independent study be counted toward their major curriculum.

Would you take a Doctor Who class, or would you probably be able to test out of it immediately? Maybe just read everything I write about it and you'll be okay.
